Distribution Control for Commercial Teams

Where control over a customer is lost, and how to recognise it before it becomes grey-market exposure.

Diversion does not begin with an order in the system. That order is the visible end of a longer process that begins when a brand loses proximity to and control over a customer, through thin relationships, insufficient support, or incentives that reward the wrong behaviour. This session prepares commercial and sales teams to see where that control is lost, how a customer relationship drifts toward becoming a source of diverted stock, and how to read an account long before a questionable order appears.

WHAT IT CHANGES

- 01 Teams that recognise a customer becoming a diversion risk before the order stage.
- 02 A shared understanding between sales and brand protection.
- 03 Earlier intervention, and fewer cases to resolve after the fact.
- 04 A consistent way to assess new accounts for exposure.

PROGRAMME · SIX MODULES

01 Where control is lost

The commercial conditions in which a customer begins to divert: relationships, support, incentives, gaps in coverage.

02 How diversion is arranged

How diverted stock actually moves in CEE, described from direct experience.

03 Reading the account

The signs that a customer relationship is drifting toward diversion, before it reaches an order.

04 The order-level checks

The final filter: order mix, terms, destinations and payment that warrant scrutiny.

05 The legal boundary

What commercial teams can and cannot do about parallel trade in the EU, without breaching competition law.

06 Case reviews

Anonymised real cases, examined step by step with the team.
